Much satisfaction has been created among the best element of the Royalist party in France by the Duke of Orleans's condemnation of those mon-archical factions known as the "Ac-tion Francaise" and the "Camelois du Rol." salves even more ridiculous than they have been heretofore.

The Duke of Orleans, referring to the complaints which he hears about his neglect to make a bold stroke for the throne of France, declares that with a keen sense of the responsibilities vosted in him as the chief of the Royalist cause, he does not propose to endanger his friends and followers, nor risk their liberty, their property and their lives, by any premature attempt to overfrow the republic. He expresses the conviction that the downfall of the latter is not far distant: "when the working man having realized that apparent liberty does not shelter him from slavery and distress, when the farmer perceives that he is deprived of the meagre profit of his toil, when the manufacturer or merchant, without any protection by the state, finds himself at the mercy of the proletariat, when every one who owns property, great or small, appreciates the extent to which his belongings are threatened by socialistic legislation and by anarchy, the people will of themselves demand the re-establishment of monarchy as the only means of restoring law and order in France."
